Try playing the tutorial at the end of this video: Now back to the video: This is what the tutorial looks like: The new equipment added to the game: Combat system: - For new Elden Lords, the combat system is quite simple. Your character can hold up to 9 items at one time (including weapons). When you attack, all items in your hand are attacked at the same time. If your attack hits a monster, the stats of your attack appear in the upper left corner of the screen. If the attack missed, your items are regained. Once you have used up your 9 items, you cannot attack until you have a new item in your hand. Even after you have used up all your items, you can still use your skills to attack. If you do not use a skill, it appears in the upper left corner of the screen. This allows you to use your items and skills in a variety of ways according to the situation. When you press the attack button, (up arrow key), all items are attacked at the same time. Depending on the difficulty of the enemy, the higher the amount of resistance. If you want to learn more about the combat system, watch the tutorial video. Item system: For non-Lord players, the hero system is a new system that shows your stats and status of all your items and enemies. When the player starts the battle, items are equipped randomly. As the battle continues, the use of items is able to be seen by all. This allows you to focus more on defeating the enemy. - When you equip an item, a bar will appear for your item. This bar shows the amount that you have used up on your items. When the bar is full, you cannot use the item. When the bar is empty, the item can be used again. - When you attack, your enemy is displayed. The smaller the enemy, the higher the damage. The higher the enemy's level, the lower the damage. This means that if an enemy is weak, you can reduce the number of weapons and attack with a single weapon to easily defeat that enemy. Now that we have already talked about the combat system, let's talk about the battle system.

Image caption Humphrey Trevelyan has been commuting to work in London since he was 10 A man with a rare genetic condition, which stops his body from building new hair cells, will miss his first day of work next week. Humphrey Trevelyan, 20, has MS, a disease which weakens his muscles, but he also has a form of dyspraxia - difficulty communicating and socialising. By 11am next Tuesday, he is expected to start his part-time job at Oxford University as a receptionist. However, the day after, he will be expected to turn up for a full-time role at the university. His mum, Anne Trevelyan, told the BBC the delay had taken away something he had worked so hard for for so many years. But when he gets the job, he will be more than equipped, having taken communication and learning skills for his A-levels. She added: "He is going to be dyslexic, he has muscular dystrophy. What else is there?" 'Self confidence' Mr Trevelyan's condition means that he cannot make new hair cells to replace those that have died. The result of this means that he now needs a special wheelchair for everyday tasks, and his arms are paralysed. The best way for us to be able to go and get his job done, is to have someone in front of him with their arms outstretched Humphrey Trevelyan, 20, who is seeking a job But his mother says that despite those difficulties, he works harder than many others. "He has worked since he was 12. He always has to do things differently. He is very strong and he tries really hard. "He does what the others do, but it's just more to him and more difficult. Sometimes he has a hard time expressing himself." Ms Trevelyan said that her son had experience of mental health services, both in the NHS and private, and that his condition had never impeded his job prospects. "He went to university to be a chef - they said 'why aren't you studying maths, or English' - and he said 'why don't you make me a receptionist, that's what I do best' and that's what he is." She said she was proud of her son, adding
