Rep. Matt Gaetz and other conservatives set out to embarrass the Justice Department for a pending lawsuit over a religious group's right to endorse candidates from the pulpit, but instead wound up embarrassing themselves. The group, Alliance Defending Freedom, or "ADF," which filed a lawsuit on behalf of a Texas megachurch, is trying to overturn a major Obama administration rule that would treat certain religious groups differently than others. The rule would require churches and other religious-affiliated non-profits, such as social services ministries and charities, to be treated the same under the law as other nonprofits, including houses of worship. ADF is suing and set to argue the case Tuesday before a federal appeals court in Washington, D.C. The congressmen accused the Justice Department of taking the case and argued it was a "thinly veiled" effort by President Obama to uphold the abortion-centered rule. Last week, the trio laid out the facts of the case and asked if anyone in the audience who was a federal prosecutor could cite a violation of the rule. None of the four ended up doing so.
