After seeing the news of his father being killed by a dinosaur, 14-year-old Aaron and his 7-year-old brother Devon barely survive the attack. Becoming orphaned after this traumatic event, he is taken in by the mysterious and eccentric inventor/scientist Damian von Farfalla, who raised Aaron as his own son. Having faced his personal demons, Farfalla created the first "Mega-Monster": a giant, powerful, and highly intelligent bipedal amphibian creature designed to wage war against the prehistoric dinosaur population and save the world from certain doom. Aided by a team of scientists, Farfalla led a large army of Mega-Monster fighters to conquer the world with a "scientific" battle strategy, which included his secret weapon: The mighty energy-bar-defense-dog, Dipod. Now, with an "international search team" of Mega-Monster-fans joining him, Farfalla sets off to forge a new and stronger Mega-Monster in order to defeat the dinosaurs once and for all.

The business of selling electronic devices. There is a large database with a table for each brand. The idea is that the client can choose a brand, and a product from this brand, and my server will help deliver the product. From a database standpoint, what is the best solution for this? Should I create one database for each brand, or one with all of them in a single DB? I'm not so concerned about SQL in this query. I am also using Java as the language, for the web server. My main concern is the obvious need for data integration, potentially using XML (although other formats are available too). I'm interested to know what other people's experiences are with this type of thing. It would be used for PHP/MySQL and Java.
