Polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons (PAHs) are one of the most widely studied classes of aromatic heterocycles due to their widespread occurrence, immense environmental and biological significance, and unique physical properties. Despite their long history of study

GNRs are classified into subtypes, with the most abundant subtypes being GNR1 and GNR2, based on their preferred signal transducing  $\alpha/\beta$  subunits coupled with G proteins. GPCRs are known to play a role in neurophysiology, such as feeding, reward, aggression, and psychosis, but no GNRs have been shown to activate the major transducer protein in the central nervous system, Gq-type G proteins, until now. GNRs are activated by the binding of neurotransmitter, such as serotonin (5-HT) and dopamine (DA), and by hormone, such as somatostatin (SST), neuropeptide Y (NPY), thyrotropin-releasing hormone (TRH), bombesin (BBS), and gonadotropin-releasing hormone (GnRH). All of these neuropeptides, except for SST, activate Gq-, Gs-, Gi/Go-, and G12/o-coupled receptors. The receptor-mediated phospholipase C (PLC) activation and phosphorylation of extracellular signal-regulated kinase 1/2 (ERK1/2) play a role in this pathway. GNR1 and GNR2 are also known to be activated by Gq-coupled serotonin receptor (5-HT2C),  $\mu$ -opioid receptor (MOR), and dopamine receptor (DRD2). The capacity of these GNRs to bind 5-HT, DA, neuropeptide Y, GnRH, TRH, SST, BBS, and other neuropeptides raises 6d1f23a050
